Philip Qualman
Superintendent
Eagle County School District

Via e-mail: [REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Qualman:

I'm writing from TeachKind, PETA's humane education division, which works with thousands of educators throughout the U.S. to bring compassion into the curriculum. We saw a report out of Gypsum that a group of teens allegedly filmed themselves flushing a live squirrel down a toilet and posted the video to social media. While we understand that the apparently involved students may have been suspended and criminal charges submitted, we urge you to equip your staff with the tools that they need to prevent further tragedies like this, and we're offering our free resources—including “Empathy Now,” our step-by-step trauma-informed guide to addressing and preventing youth violence against animals—to that end. Because this story has gained media attention, other students may be understandably troubled by the actions of their peers, so it's important that this urgent matter be addressed with the entire student body.

As mental-health and law-enforcement experts well know, cruelty to animals and violence against humans are inextricably linked. Many educators are aware that serial killers and school shooters tend to have a history of cruelty to animals, but it's also common for young people to have witnessed the abuse of animals, which can be a form of trauma, and children who have observed acts of cruelty to animals are more likely to abuse animals themselves. Schools can help mitigate the effects that traumatizing incidents in their community can have on students.

Given that young people all around the country are acting out and becoming violent, likely in part because of the challenges and trauma resulting from the COVID-19 pandemic, it's vital that schools set a standard of compassion. According to Colorado law, school districts are strongly encouraged to include character education programming in order to “better prepare students to become positive contributors to society.” Existing programming can be bolstered by incorporating humane education into your schools' curricula, which would allow you to reach susceptible kids before they engage in violent behavior. The school year may be nearly over, but by acting now and adjusting your curricula for this fall, you can help prevent acts of cruelty in the future.

While you may have seen some of PETA's attention-grabbing campaigns, you may not be as familiar with TeachKind's work. We're former teachers who strive to find common ground with school leaders and create educationally sound materials that help meet students' unique needs while developing their empathy. We're sending you our free “Share the World” curriculum. It's the perfect tool for teaching young students the Golden Rule and the importance of compassion and empathy. We're also sending you “Challenging Assumptions,” our free secondary school social justice curriculum designed to encourage empathy toward others regardless of species, race, gender, sexual identity, age, or ability. Our staff would love to provide additional materials and even host virtual presentations for your students—all free of charge. We'd also be happy to work directly with teachers in your district.

On behalf of PETA and our many members and supporters who live in Colorado, thank you for your consideration. May I please hear from you as soon as possible?

Sincerely,

Andrew Burton
TeachKind Assistant
